

An SBA Disaster Loan May be the Key to Your Recovery

Release Date: Sep 13, 2022

I Don't Own a Business, Why Do I Need an SBA Loan?

While most people think of the SBA as only helping small businesses, in times of disaster, low-interest disaster loans can help businesses of any size, homeowners and renters affected by disaster.

Homeowners can receive up to $200,000 for the repair or replacement of real estate. Homeowners and renters may borrow up to $40,000 to repair or replace personal property. Loan amounts cannot exceed the uninsured disaster loss, as verified by SBA.

What Should I Do if I'm Referred to SBA?

FEMA may refer you to the SBA if your income meets minimum loan guidelines. If you are referred to SBA for a disaster loan, it is important that you take the time to apply. To receive further FEMA assistance, you must be denied for a loan.

If an SBA loan doesn't cover all your needs – you may be eligible for additional FEMA grant assistance to replace essential household items, replace or repair a damaged vehicle, cover storage expenses or meet other disaster-related needs.

There is no obligation to accept a disaster loan. FEMA will help applicants who refuse an SBA loan with referrals to community partners like volunteer and community agencies to assist with disaster needs.
